I am happy to come here and meet you all. I deem it a pride to inaugurate this Seminar in which people who have devoted their lives to the cause of rural welfare are taking part. I have no doubt whatsoever that you will evolve a nice plan of action for the development of rural areas in the country.

You are all aware that India lives in villages. More than eighty percent of our population lives in rural areas. The progress and prosperity of our nation depends completely on the economic and social life of our people living in the rural areas. The plan that we prepare for the development of villages should have both social and economic content. It should aim at maximum agricultural production and a large growth of village and cottage industries based on the agricultural products. If we study the prosperity of some areas in our country carefully we can find that it is only due to the development of agriculture and industries.

We can bring about great improvement in the agricultural production through small and simple measures. It is a pity that we are neglecting, the old agricultural practices, which proved to be the best. At the same time, I am not against the modern technology. Poverty and unemployment are the two challenges that we are facing in our country. It is only by way of using the available manpower and the land resources in the best possible manner, we will be able to meet those two challenges. It is only then they can take advantage of modern scientific developments.
